Not much to say about the new 10.2-inch iPad. The same device from last year with one major development: it now has an A12 processor instead of last year's A10. a big difference and if you have a multi-year iPad it's a good time to consider updating. Last year I increased the size of the base iPad screen and added a smart connector to its side, but that didn't change the processor. The update is a major transformation. This is a new chip for the iPad that brings the originals to the 8th generation of the iPad, including a 6-core processor and a 4-core GPU. These additions to Apple Silicon mean that you can get 40% faster CPU performance compared to twice as much as the 7th generation iPad and graphics. This means faster gaming, better graphic performance while playing, and better graphic management of applications with higher resolution content that handle photo manipulation or graphic design features. Apple has discovered that this new A12 bionic chip is head-to-head with some of the standard devices on the 8th generation iPad and is even faster: 2x faster than a Windows laptop 3x faster than Android tablets 6x faster than most popular Chromebooks
